

malicious behavior, identity theft, etc., in the same way it does so for American citizens, provided that the foreign citizens' government does not restrict the use of the American internet hosting service.

- It shall be unlawful for American internet hosting services to hold unjustified biases towards foreign citizens.
- If an American internet hosting service allows information and provides services, which a foreign government has listed as unlawful for its citizens to use, the American internet hosting service shall cooperate with and respect that country's policies.
- The U.S. government shall not promote internet hosting services in foreign countries whose governments restrict their citizens from using them.

Defense

Though some stakeholders might argue that the U.S. national policy allows the government to control internet activity too powerfully, in ways that are not feasible, that is not the case. First, the policy works to permit individuals' freedom to communicate their honest beliefs on contested topics, provided that the exaggerated words they decide to use do not break laws involving hate speech, violence, and pornography; it is stated in this way because of the government's commitments to protect the people from harm and not to be an overbearing controller of internet activity. Second, the policy works to preserve the people from unwarranted internet searches, malicious behavior, data misuse, and nontransparent marketing strategies, both by the government and other stakeholders, thereby eliminating "central government control" over all