

lawful internet activity; the only control that the government has is over destructive internet activity, which is deemed unlawful.

Additionally, some stakeholders might argue that this foreign policy is too risky in regards to the American stakeholders' relations with authoritative governments and terrorist groups, however, theoretically, this is not the case. First, the policy works to protect American citizens when they are outside of the U.S. Second, the policy works to eliminate "central government control" and trust innovative internet hosting services and technology companies to make constructive decisions, policies, and products. Third, the policy works to ensure that internet hosting services respect a diversity of cultures and contexts by making it unlawful for U.S. stakeholders to hold biases. Finally, the policy works to ensure that both the American government and American internet hosting services respect foreign governments as we would want them to do. I therefore propose the entirety of this policy to Congress, with confidence.
